

Digital health working group

Nadia Jackson

Digital health interventions are expected to be one way of helping the NHS rise to the challenges of delivering more and better care with reduced resource, and there are numerous examples of efficacious interventions, but to date, relatively few examples of successful implementation of digital health interventions into routine care within the NHS. Specific areas where research is urgently needed include: improving user uptake of and engagement with digital health interventions, and achieving integration and implementation within routine care.